Meeting the challenges of Agriculture and Forestry with Commissioner Bob Odom

With just a few clicks of the mouse Louisiana consumers can find out if their favorite restaurants are participating in the All-American Catfish Campaign sponsored by the Department of Agriculture and Forestry and the Louisiana Catfish Promotion and Research Board.

Agriculture and Forestry Commissioner Bob Odom said a complete listing of all the restaurants participating is now located on the department's Web site, www.ldaf.state.la.us.

"We've listed all of the restaurants and delis that signed up to display the 'We Proudly Serve 100% All-American Catfish' decal," Odom explained. "We have right at 160 restaurants and delis listed in alphabetical order by city. If it's Friday night and you want to go out to eat catfish just get on the Internet and see if you're favorite restaurant is there."

Odom reminds consumers that the list does not contain every restaurant in the state that serves domestic catfish. Some restaurants simply aren't aware of the program yet or have chosen not to participate.

To access the restaurant listing from the department's Web site, select "All-American Catfish Campaign" from the main page and then select "Participating Restaurants" from the catfish campaign page. The list will be updated weekly as new businesses join the promotional campaign.

The All-American Catfish Campaign was started this year to help catfish farmers promote domestic catfish to Louisiana consumers. Imports of Vietnamese basa, which is sometimes incorrectly labeled Vietnamese catfish, have drastically increased over the last several years causing acreage and price to decrease domestically.

Figures show 2001 imports into the United States of primarily Vietnamese basa increased to 17 million pounds, nearly two-and-a-half times the 2000 import figure.

The increased imports of Vietnamese basa have received attention in Washington, D.C. as well.

"The catfish industry in Louisiana has been hurt by the increased importation of mislabeled fish and fish products from Vietnam," Sen. John Breaux said. "These increased imports of mislabeled products create lower prices for American catfish. I am very pleased the U.S. Department of Commerce and International Trade Commission will conduct separate, preliminary investigations into unfair trade complaints by the American catfish industry and look forward to the results of these inquiries."

Sen. Mary Landrieu expressed similar sentiments.

"Louisiana catfish are grown by proud farmers who care deeply about the quality of their product," Landrieu said. "This is just one reason why mislabeling catfish and catfish products is so damaging to this important industry. The announcement that catfish producers will file an anti-dumping suit and that the Department of Commerce as well as the International Trade Commission will investigate is a good first step into acknowledging the unfair trade practices of producers overseas who claim to be supplying 'catfish' when they actually are not."

During the spring, Odom sent letters to Louisiana restaurants and delis offering a free decal to those who serve domestic catfish. The eateries that wanted to participate signed a contract with the department stating they could display the decal in their storefront as long as they served domestic catfish.

"I'm pleased with the success of the campaign so far. We've gotten a lot of attention from the press and have seen many positive articles and

Department of Agriculture and Forestry foresters Bret Lane and Don Smith trained in Oregon last month to coordinate helicopters, like the one pictured here, during wildfire suppression efforts. The pair took this picture while the helicopter loaded a bucket, suspended by cable below, into a tank filled with flame retardant. Thank you signs were displayed throughout the Oregon towns where foresters Bret Lane, parish supervisor in Clinton, and Don Smith, district forester in Olla, trained last month for Helitack helicopter member certification in wildfire suppression efforts. The training taught Smith and Lane to coordinate ground crews with helicopters to make aerial water and flame retardant drops.

Foresters attend helicopter fire suppression training

Two Louisiana Department of Agriculture and Forestry foresters returned home this week from a month of helicopter fire suppression training out west, Commissioner Bob Odom said.

Bret Lane, a forestry parish supervisor in Clinton, and Don Smith, a district forester in Olla, were sent to train on the Biscuit Fire in Kirby, Oregon. The training, called Helitack, teaches forestry firefighters to work with helicopters that provide aerial support to ground crews during wildfires.

"Since the extreme fire outbreak we had two years ago, we have been using every opportunity available to better train and further educate our forestry firefighters in new and different fire suppression techniques," Odom said. "During that outbreak we purchased eight 'Bambi' buckets and worked with National Guard helicopters to use aerial water drops to control the fires."

Odom said fighting fires from the air was a technique many of the department's forestry firefighters were unfamiliar with unless they had volunteered for wildfire duty out of state.

"We had to do the best we could on short notice back then, but now we have two men who are helicopter member certified and can train our crews to work with National Guard pilots to fill the buckets with water, drop the water on fires and reload when necessary," Odom added.

Lane and Smith said their on-the-job training days began with a wakeup call at 4:30 a.m. and lasted until about 10 p.m.

"In the morning you would crawl out of your tent after sleeping on the ground and get dressed, go to the fire camp and eat breakfast. By 7 a.m. you had to report to the helibase, load the crews and shuffle them up to the top of the mountain. Any supplies that they needed would be taken and set up as well," Lane explained. The pair also worked getting tanks of water and flame retardant set up so the helicopters could drop their buckets in and fill up.

Flight operations stopped each day around 8 p.m. and the men would return to camp, eat dinner and turn in for the night.

"Most people would say it was primitive, but I'd say it was just a normal everyday operation for fighting wildfires. We enjoyed it because we were able to camp near the helibase, which is a lot quieter than some of the fire camps," Lane said. "There are 2,500 people in fire camp, so we liked the quietness of the helibase. But, you are still eating sack lunches and showers are few and far between."

Both foresters said the communities near the fire were very supportive and thankful for the work the firefighters were performing.

"The people were very nice and appreciative of what we were doing," Smith said. "The town even took up a collection of socks, toothpaste, toothbrushes and other necessities to help the firefighters with things they may have forgotten at home or run out of during their stay."

Lane said the grateful nature of the community made it easier to be away from home for a month.

"When a 60-year-old lady you don't even know stops in the middle of the road and gives you a hug and says 'thanks,' that makes it worth the while to have to leave your family for so long," Lane said. "That's what it's all about."

Odom said Lane and Smith are going to put together a program that they will take to each forestry district in the state to train fire crews in the different techniques that can be utilized with buckets in fires suppression efforts. Both men also said they plan to train for further certification in Helitack operations in the future.

editorials in newspapers around the state. There's even been some national coverage of the campaign, which means we're really getting the message out," Odom said.

"We're not trying to keep people from eating imported fish if that's what they would like to eat, we just want them to know what they're being served. I don't think many people go to Louisiana restaurants hoping they're going to be served Vietnamese basa so they should know if that's what it is."

Odom said the Catfish Promotion and Research board also recently approved the production and distribution of table tents and menu stickers that will promote domestic catfish in participating restaurants. Both items feature the same design as the window decal and will be offered to restaurant owners for free.

In Louisiana, farm-raised catfish contributed $39.8 million to the state's economy in 2001, down from $47.8 million in 2000. Acreage dropped from 14,390 in 2000 to 13,312 in 2001, and production went from 67.1 million pounds in 2000 to slightly more than 64 million pounds in 2001.

Figures show 2001 imports into the United States of primarily Vietnamese basa increased to 17 million pounds, nearly two-and-a-half times the 2000 import figure.

Poisonous plants can damage muscles and cause death

Cattle are at risk of muscle damage and possible death in the late summer and fall from a couple of unique poisonous plants, according to Dr. Steve Nicholson, a veterinary toxicologist with the LSU AgCenter.

Calling them "two of the most important poisonous plants in this region," Nicholson says the common names for these poisonous plants are coffeeweed or coffee-senna (Senna occidentalis) and sicklepod (S obtusifolia).

"These plants can be found across the state – including sandy ridges in coastal parishes," Nicholson says, adding, "Both plants have been a problem in corn fields used in corn silage production"

The LSU AgCenter veterinarian cautions that even hay containing coffeesenna could pose a risk to cattle.

While he explains that sicklepod is more common and is often found in fields or pastures where row crops were once grown, Nicholson says coffeesenna seems to grow abundantly in sandy soils but may be found in most areas of the state.

"Dangerous quantities of coffee-senna may occur in corrals and holding pens where horses and cattle may be confined temporarily," Nicholson says, adding, "This plant seems especially attractive to cattle immediately after it has been damaged by frost or mowing."

"Coffeesenna is so toxic to cattle that they develop signs of poisoning after eating less than one third of their daily diet," Nicholson stresses, explaining, however, that smaller portions consumed daily for five days by cattle also have caused fatal poisoning. Horses that eat the plant develop liver damage.

Sicklepod is less toxic but it is

As the start of various hunting seasons approaches, LSU AgCenter medical entomologist Dr. Michael Perich is warning hunters to exercise caution to avoid mosquito-borne diseases when in the woods and when cleaning their kill.

West Nile virus has become a threat in many areas of the state, and other mosquito-borne diseases, such as the St. Louis encephalitis outbreak that hit Northeast Louisiana last year, also could be a problem unless people take appropriate precautions, health officials say.

Various mosquito-borne diseases – which can lead to encephalitis, or swelling of the brain – are spread to animals, including humans, through mosquito bites.

The West Nile virus is spread through mosquitoes and migratory birds, such as blue jays, cardinals and sparrows. Mosquitoes get blood from these birds and then spread it to other animals and humans.

That's why bird hunters should be doubly cautious, Perich says. The LSU AgCenter expert explains hunters need to avoid mosquito bites and to take precautions when cleaning fowl – even though he added that as of Thursday (Aug. 29) there was no confirmed evidence of transmission of the West Nile virus from cleaning birds.

"The official word from the Centers for Disease Control is for hunters to wear plastic or rubber gloves when cleaning birds," Perich said.

In addition, Perich says there are certain items hunters should have on hand when they go into the woods to help prevent mosquitoes from attacking.

"Two items that are fairly effective at preventing mosquito bites are head nets and Bug-Out jackets," he said, adding, "These items can be found in most outdoor catalogs."

The head nets are nets that fit over the head, protecting the face and neck. Bug-Out jackets are mesh net jackets with a hood. A net is attached to the hood and covers the face.

Perich said hunters also may opt to use odorless repellents in the fight against mosquitoes. One repellent is a ThermaCell.

This device works as a smoke coil and uses butane for fuel. It puts out a repellent that kills mosquitoes. ThermaCell can be found at most discount stores. It is designed to use at activities such as picnics and barbecues.

Using repellents that contain DEET, or diethyl-m-toluamide, is another step hunters can take to protect themselves, Perich says, adding that label directions for such products should be read and carefully followed.

Insect repellents containing DEET have been found to help prevent bites from ticks, mosquitoes and other biting insects, Perich said. Various forms and concentrations are available.

Making sure your body is well still dangerous, according to Nicholson.

"Cattle poisoned by these plants become weak and unable to stand. And their urine may initially be coffee-colored because of the presence of myoglobin released from severely damaged muscles," he says.

Affected cattle may appear to be bright and alert but not make any attempt to stand up.

"Death is the usual outcome of poisoning, but owners who provide water, hay and temporary shade as needed may save one occasionally," the veterinarian says, adding, "Coffeesenna and sicklepod have caused major losses of cattle on farms and ranches in years past."

"Cattle producers are urged to learn to recognize these plants and take steps necessary to eliminate them from pastures, corrals and fields."

covered is the surest way of protecting yourself from mosquito bites, Perich said, explaining, "The more skin that is not exposed, the less chances there are for mosquitoes to bite you."

Other steps LSU AgCenter experts say you can take to prevent mosquito bites include:

- Avoid outdoor activities when mosquitoes are the more active (dusk to dawn).
- Wear long sleeve shirts and long pants. Avoid dark colors, which attract mosquitoes.
- Apply insect repellent to exposed skin. Be sure to follow the instructions on the label and be careful not to exceed the recommended dose, particularly on children.
- Repair holes and tears in screens, and secure windows and doors to keep insects out.
- Treat frequently used doorways with an insecticide.

To cut down on mosquitoes that may be breeding or living nearby, remove standing water from items such as bird baths, buckets and tires. Also, you should remove other debris from the area, mow grass regularly, and if desired, treat dense areas of trees and shrubs with a recommended insecticide.
